

THE LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER

A NOVEL

This sample book was generated for testing the FMJL importer.

No part of it is a real publication.

CONTENTS

I. The Tower

II. The Boat

III. The Storm

CHAPTER I.

In the autumn of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the lamp with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the winter of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the logbook with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the spring of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the brass rail with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the summer of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the oil store with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the autumn of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the foghorn with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the winter of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the stair with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the spring of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the lamp with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

Every evening she did the same four things:

trimming the wick

polishing the lens

winding the clock

writing the date in the log

CHAPTER II.

In the winter of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the oil store with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the spring of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the foghorn with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the summer of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the stair with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the autumn of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the lamp with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the winter of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the logbook with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the spring of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the brass rail with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the summer of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the oil store with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

CHAPTER III.

In the spring of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the lamp with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the summer of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the logbook with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the autumn of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the brass rail with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the winter of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the oil store with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the spring of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the foghorn with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the summer of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the stair with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.

In the autumn of that year Mara climbed the tower before dawn, as she had done for eleven years, and checked the lamp with the slow care her father had taught her. The sea below was grey and patient, and the gulls had not yet woken. She wrote the hour in the margin, the state of the wind, and a line about the boats that had passed in the night, because a keeper who forgets the small things will one day forget a large one. When the light was steady she sat on the top step and watched the coast take shape out of the dark, first the rocks, then the harbour wall, then the roofs of the village where nobody remembered that the tower had a keeper at all.